CHURCH DRAFT ON JEWS CHALLENGED, SIGNS POINT TO ALTERATION BY SEPTEMBER COUNCIL

Leaders of major American Jewish organizations expressed disappointment and criticism at a report from Rome that opposition was rising among conservative Roman Catholic prelates to the draft declaration on the attitude of the church toward Jews, says the New York Times. The report disclosed that the conservative block was asking a revision to a preliminary statement adopted by an overwhelming vote at the closing session of the Ecumenical Council last September that absolved the Jews of any collective responsibility for the crucifixion of Jesus.

The opposition by a small but powerful group of ultra-conservative cardinals, the report indicated, is based on doctrinal grounds. It also indicated that Arab diplomacy and pressure of Catholic bishops in Arab countries had been applied because they said the preliminary document served Israeli political ends.

Morris B. Abram, president of the American Jewish Committee, an organization devoted to safeguarding the civil and religious rights of Jews, asserted that "the report fills us with sadness and keen disappointment."

Referring to the report of Arab pressures, Mr. Abram recalled an audience that Pope Paul VI granted him and other leaders of the committee last May. At the time, he said, the Pope emphasized that the concern with Christian-Jewish relations was solely a religious matter.

Mr. Abram voiced the hope that "vast forces of enlightenment in the Catholic Church will prevail and that the final action of the Ecumenical Council will forge an unbreakable bond of human brotherhood, so desperately needed in this strife-torn world."

The Rev. Dr. Joachim Prinz, president of the American Jewish Congress, declared that the Vatican Council's declaration on Jews was "drafted out of recognition that Catholic doctrine has, over the centuries been a hidden but major cause of anti-Semitism."

The Jewish Congress lists as its aims the strengthening of Jewish life and the advancement of human rights in all Americans.

Dr. Prinz said the decision of the Catholic fathers to draft the statement must be viewed "not as an effort to exonerate the Jews from the guilt of deicide but as a means of exonerating the church from the role its teachings have played in anti-Semitism and the horrors resulting from it."

The long-controversial draft declaration on the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church toward Jews and other non-Christians again is under convergent attack by two powerful forces — reaching up to the highest levels of the church, says Richard C. Doty, New York Times writer in Rome. According to scraps of information filtering through the wall of silence imposed early this year on the issue, powerful conservative forces are attacking on doctrinal grounds the draft given preliminary approval by a huge majority of the church hierarchy in the Ecumenical Council last fall.

At the same time, Arab diplomacy and the pressure of Catholic bishops in Arab lands have been applied steadily either to eliminate the declaration, on the ground that it would serve Israeli political ends, or so dilute its message as to make it meaningless.

Signs that the declaration exonerating the Jews of any collective responsibility for the Crucifixion of Jesus faced a serious new challenge were these:

Submission of the conditionally approved document to an ad hoc, extra conciliar commission of four, including one of the most ultraconservative voices in the church, the Most Rev. Luigi Carli, Bishop of Segni, Italy, for review and recommendations for revision in a conservative direction.

Reported expressions of opinions by the highest Vatican authorities that the declaration must be revised to insure its orthodoxy and "purity of doctrine" as well as to safeguard the interests of Roman Catholics living in Arab lands who fear governmental discrimination if the declaration is passed in its present form.

A magazine article by Bishop Carli last month bluntly asserted that the Jews of Christ's day did, indeed, bear collective responsibility for His crucifixion, says the New York Times. Further, the Bishop wrote that, to the extent that Judaism today constitutes the "free and voluntary continuation" of that of Jesus's time, today's Jews continue to "participate objectively in the responsibility for deicide."

Bourguiba: "Everyone Knows That A War Over Palestine Is Impossible; That It Would Be Stopped After A Few Hours By The Great Powers; We Have Not Persecuted The Jews, Can Co-operate On The Basis Of Mutual Respect"

"What I have suggested is that all the resolutions of the United Nations should be applied, including that concerning partition — which would mean the restoration of an important bit of territory now held by Israel to the Arab state of Palestine — and that concerning the return of the refugees. This would mean that the Israelis occupied a reduced area, but they would have the great compensation of peace and an end to a state of veiled war."

With these words, spoken in an address to Tunisian students, President Habib Bourguiba returned to the theme of Palestine. Earlier remarks by him on the subject during his recent tour of the Middle East, have caused a storm in many parts of the Arab world, says the London Times. His critics have often shown an imperfect understanding of what he proposed, and he has since amplified his earlier remark, notably in a previous address and in an interview with M. Jean Daniel in the French periodical Le Nouvel Observateur.

President Bourguiba said he did not undertake his Middle East journey because of Palestine. But when he was in Jordan he visited the refugee camps. "It was an indescribable sight. These refugees have been kept going on chimerical hopes and sterile hatreds." But hatred, said Mr. Bourguiba, has been made an excuse for inaction. He could easily have given them the usual talk about a speedy return home, combined with the pledge that everyone was ready to die for Palestine, and so on. But he would have considered such conduct shameful.

Everyone knew, he said, that a war over Palestine was impossible, and that it would be stopped after a few hours by the great powers. The United States was committed to intervene with equal firmness against aggression by Israel or against Israel. Therefore some other means had to be found to break the seventeen-year deadlock.

The President said that the example of Tunisia, in its struggle to rid itself of French rule, proved the efficacy of proceeding stage by stage, and the affair of Israel could, he thought, be settled in the same way, reports the London Times. "I am not one of those who are content simply to repeat as a leitmotiv that they are opposed to colonialism. If that had been my own attitude Tunisia would still be under French domination."

President Bourguiba insisted that he had no intention of putting himself at the head of the Palestinian people. This was first and foremost an affair for the Palestinians themselves. He said:

"In the event of Israel accepting our proposals and showing itself willing to negotiate, the partners would, of course, be the Palestinians and the Jews. For my part, as an Arab, I have given a warning. It now is for Israel to speak.

"If Israel takes up my proposal there could be an immediate exploratory move to see if the Arabs are favourable. The machinery for a meeting, either in Rome or in another capital, could be studied. We would occupy ourselves in helping this contact. I would discuss with President Nasser the methods to use."

Mr. Bourguiba's stepped-up campaign of moderation toward Israel first became public March 6, when, in a speech at Beirut, he said, according to the New York Herald Tribune, "We have not persecuted the Jews and we can still cooperate with them on the basis of mutual respect."

The delegation of the Palestine Liberation Organization in New York announced that it "totally disagrees" with the proposal of President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia that the Israel-Arab dispute be settled on the basis of the United Nations plan advanced seventeen years ago, says the New York Times. The plan would include the handing back by Israel of part of her territory to a Palestine Arab state.

Dr. Izzat Tannous, chairman of the organization, said his group "wishes to state that the solution of the Palestine problem is in the hands of the Palestinian people only."

Omar Asouni, head of another Arab organization in New York, the Palestine Arab Delegation, said it was unfortunate that Mr. Shukairy declined to name the states causing difficulties, but he, too, rejected Mr. Bourguiba's suggestion.

"The Palestine Arab people have their own political maturity to speak for themselves and to determine their own fate. No head of an Arab state has the authority or right to speak for them and make proposals affecting their freedom and their rights in their homeland, Palestine," he said.

Mr. Bourguiba, who in recent weeks has taken an increasingly moderate stand toward Israel, also was criticized by fellow Arabs a month ago. Then he urged other Arab states not to break relations with West Germany, says the New York Herald Tribune, because of Bonn's plans to recognize Israel. Algeria and Morocco sided with him against President Nasser.

President Bourguiba's proposal for resolving Arab-Israeli disputes stirred interest but not high hopes in United Nations circles. Some Arab spokesmen were skeptical that the Tunisian leader had actually made such a proposal.

The interest of others was directed chiefly at the fact that the Tunisian President seemed to be suggesting terms for settling the dispute at a time when a number of Arab spokesmen were insisting that the Arab states would go to war if necessary to preserve their claims to Jordan River waters.

The Tunisian President's suggestions, made in a speech before Tunisian students, had been judged so important that French-language newspapers in Tunis delayed their deadlines for five hours to print a full translation from the Arabic.

Mr. Bourguiba expressed hope that if his proposals met a positive response, [illegible] reconciliation could eventually be achieved.

He castigated as inefficient policies adopted by Israel's Arab neighbors in the last seventeen years, notably what he called their feeding of catch phrases to the Palestine Arab refugees in their countries.

On the other hand, the President said, these states could hardly forget what he termed "Israeli aggression" in 1956 during the Suez crisis.

Israel was then condemned by world opinion to return to her initial positions, Mr. Bourguiba asserted. Any Arab aggression against Israel, he added, is bound to meet with a similar fate.

President Bourguiba's statement represented a departure from previous public declarations on the subject when he advocated Palestine's "liberation" by the Palestine Arabs themselves through the step-by-step method that brought independence to Tunisia; negotiation when accepted by the other side, armed combat if not, says the New York Times. He had not hitherto spelled out detailed terms for a settlement, nor come out in favor of the maintenance of a truncated Israeli state.

The Egyptian press, signaling the end of Cairo's sixteen-month-old policy of pursuing Arab harmony and cooperation, lashed out at the proposal by Tunisia's President, Habib Bourguiba, for Arab co-existence and negotiations with Israel, says Hedrick Smith, Cairo writer to the New York Times. An editorial in the authoritative newspaper, Al Ahram, believed to reflect the views of President Gamal Abdel Nasser, said Mr. Bourguiba's declarations "would not allow the U.A.R." to take part in any further Arab leaders' meetings with the Tunisian President.

It accused Mr. Bourguiba of "moving within the lines of a plan laid down by the Western imperialist powers in a conspiracy against the entire Arab destiny."

"Shut up, Bourguiba," was the blunt comment of the newspaper Al Akhbar, which charged him with "a stab in the back of the people of Palestine."

For over a month diplomatic circles have been expecting Mr. Nasser to switch from his carefully concerted policy of Arab cooperation against Israel despite obvious internal differences among the Arab states and their differing political systems.

The press in Cairo has recently aired Cairo's nagging dispute with Saudi Arabia over the civil war in Yemen, but the key issue has been the refusal of Mr. Bourguiba, joined by Libya and Morocco, to go along with the Arab foreign ministers' decision to break off relations with West Germany when it recognizes Israel.

Mr. Bourguiba's remarks on that issue were published in Cairo with a notable lack of criticism, and the Egyptian press was generally restrained toward Libya and Morocco on the German question, considering the paramount importance of the issue to the Arab world.

Some experts believed that Mr. Nasser had been hesitant to take the initiative in abandoning the policy of Arab harmony he nurtured at two meetings of Arab leaders last year, says the New York Times, and that Mr. Bourguiba's statement offered an opportunity.

Mr. Bourguiba always has opposed Arab calls for a Moslem holy war against Israel.

The Al Ahram editorial reported to have been written by Mr. Nasser's confidant, Mohammed Hassanein Heikal, indicated that the Egyptians intend to force the Arab states to choose between Cairo and Tunis at the Arab Premiers' meeting in May.

Independent observers are doubtful that Tunisia, and possibly Morocco and Libya, will participate in the meeting.

Mr. Heikal also declared that Cairo's participation in the scheduled Arab meeting in Morocco in September "would be of no value" if Mr. Bourguiba took part. He suggested that Cairo's military secrets would not be safe.

The position Mr. Bourguiba has chosen, Mr. Heikal continued, "does not permit the U.A.R. to join him in any political consultations concerning the Arab present and future."

Mr. Bourguiba's remarks also were denounced by Ahmad Shukairy, leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, who accused the Tunisian leader of "clear deviation from the Arab summit meetings."

He rejected Mr. Bourguiba's suggestion for negotiations between Arab refugees and Israel.

"The Palestine question can have only one solution, restoration of Arab Palestine without partition, internationalization, or resettlement," Mr. Shukairy said, according to the New York Times.

He suggested that other Arab governments besides Tunisia had raised "base difficulties" on the Palestine issue.

A Beirut, Lebanon, report to the New York Times says:

A Beirut newspaper published a cartoon showing President Bourguiba of Tunisia as Judas walking away with thirty pieces of silver while Palestine dies on the cross.

The newspaper, Al Moharrer, whose policy is Nasserite, and the Baathist newspaper Al Ahrar, called Mr. Bourguiba "the Judas of the Arabs." Al Moharrer said he should be "ostracized as an Arab without mercy." It said a traitor who sold military secrets to the enemy deserved more mercy. Al Ahrar called for his "liquidation."

Another Beirut newspaper, the independent Al Jarida, saw some sense in Mr. Bourguiba's stand. Noting that Israel had been quick to reject his proposals, Al Jarida's columnist, Tawfic Mokdissi, continued:

"A question mark is raised over the protests voiced by certain quarters against Bourguiba, who has after all not actually introduced any new element into the Arab stand on Palestine. All he wanted was to get the Palestine question moving again at the level of the United Nations."

L'Action, of Tunis, the organ of Tunisia's governmental Socialist Destour party, denied that President Bourguiba had sought any contact with Israeli representatives with a view to solving the Palestine problem.

The French-language paper asserted that reports to this effect had emanated from "Zionist circles" and were absurd since no Arab leader could substitute himself for the Palestine Arabs in the choice of a method for their "liberation."

The Cairo press voiced concern two days later that Morocco, Libya, and Saudi Arabia were silently supporting the proposals of President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia for Arab acceptance of rejection of Jesus by many men by reference to the Jews who "in the end, killed him." Assurances by Vatican spokesmen that this was merely a pastoral reference to scriptural texts without any significance for the declaration have failed to still speculation that it indicated papal adoption of the conservative thesis.

CHURCH DRAFT ON JEWS CHALLENGED, SIGNS POINT TO ALTERATION BY SEPTEMBER

Two-way diplomatic activity — by Arab representatives contending that the declaration would be interpreted as Vatican support for Israel and by Vatican representatives sounding out other governments on their position on the declaration.

Liberal Catholic sponsors of the declaration seek, by unequivocal refutation of the old charge of collective Jewish responsibility for the crucifixion of Jesus, to eliminate from Catholic teaching an identified source of anti-Semitic attitudes.

The text approved last November states that "all that happened to Christ in His passion cannot be attributed to the whole [Jewish] people then alive, much less to those of today." It also forbids presentation of the Jews as a "deicide people" and generally condemns anti-Semitism and all other forms of intolerance.

It now appears more than likely that this wording will be substantially altered before the Council reconvenes September 17. The change may be made this month during a plenary meeting of the Council Secretariat for Christian Unity.

This assessment, by qualified observers, is based on a series of occurrences, some public, some behind the scenes.

The most recent of these was the submission of the declaration to an extra-conciliar commission of four members for review and recommendations for change. They were reported to have first prepared a completely new and shortened text that tended, on the crucifixion issue, reports the New York Times, to speak of the role of the Jews in a tone of forgiveness rather than exoneration.

One member of the commission, according to some reports Giovanni Cardinal Colombo, Archbishop of Milan, held out against this change, strongly advocated by Bishop Carli with agreement of two others.

To break the deadlock and achieve the unanimity that Pope Paul was said to have requested the commission, according to these reports, decided to submit agreed recommendations for redrafting by the Secretariat for Christian Unity, headed by the progressive Augustin Cardinal Bea, instead of a new text.

These recommendations were reported to have come closer to the spirit of the current draft but to have left open and ambiguous the question of possible collective guilt of the Jews in the time of Jesus.

Another indication of the trend was the speech of Pope Paul on April 4, Passion Sunday, in which he used the Jews as an example of the refusal of men, to this day, to receive Jesus's message of salvation. In this sermon he repeated the statement that the Jews "not only did not recognize him, but they fought him, slandered him and, in the end, killed him."

Although Vatican spokesmen sought to minimize the importance of the statement, they privately conceded that it had been an unfortunate lapse.

Many observers doubted, however, that a man of Pope Paul's sensitivity to currents of opinion would have been guilty of a slip of the tongue on such a controversial issue.

They speculated that the Pontiff had sought to test public reaction on the issue, in which case protests from Italian and foreign Jewish groups must have been instructive, or had wanted to indicate publicly that the policy of full exoneration of the Jews was under review and revision.

High-ranking churchmen, including Americans, who have sought reassurance from Rome that there would be no substantive changes in the declaration approved in November with only 99 dissenting votes out of 1,992 ballots cast, says the New York Times, have received equivocal answers from the highest Vatican sources.

These replies have made reference to the need for strict orthodoxy purity and to the probable shortening and editing of the Council text.

Such expressions apparently refer to various scriptural passages that blame the Jews for the Crucifixion in general, Biblical language. Church progressives have tried to make it impossible for a few such phrases to be used as the basis for a general bill of attainder against the Jews collectively.

The conservatives, on the other hand, cling to a fundamentalist interpretation of the scriptural passages and reject any liberal exegesis of them in terms both of more precise historical knowledge, New Testament events, and modern conditions.

Between the second and third sessions of the Council, the commission drastically re-edited the declaration to eliminate reference to the deicide issue. The liberal wording was restored by demand of the Council majority under leadership of the American hierarchy, says the New York Times. Recent events seem to indicate, however, that the majority won a battle, not the war.

In a move on November 30, 1964, clearly designed to placate Arab critics, the Vatican reaffirmed the non-political nature of the text on Jews approved over-whelmingly by the Roman Catholic Church's Ecumenical Council on November 20, reported the New York Times of December 1.

The Vatican statement coincided with news that Pope Paul VI on his flight to India would make a stop over in Beirut, Lebanon, that had not been scheduled originally.

A Vatican announcement said "technical reasons" prompted the "unforeseen landing" in Beirut, but it was already able to state that President Charles Helou and Premier Hussein Oueini of Lebanon together with church and civil dignitaries would greet the Pontiff at the airport. It was thought that the announcement was preceded by diplomatic exchanges between the Vatican and Beirut.

Some recent reports had suggested that Arab governments maintaining diplomatic relations with the Vatican might recall their envoys from Rome in protest against the Council declaration on Jews. Arab leaders and newspapers had been harshly critical of the declaration, asserting that it heralded Vatican recognition of the state of Israel soon.

The Vatican restatement on November 30, of the purely religious significance of the Council declaration on Jews, rejected "arbitrary and twisted" interpretations that read "political intentions and aims" into it.

The statement appeared on the front page of the l'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, over the signature of Augustin Cardinal Bea. The German Jesuit Cardinal is president of the Council's Secretariat for Christian Unity. He sponsored the text on Jews that the Council endorsed 1,770 to 185, in a preliminary vote.

The text was scheduled to be formally promulgated by the Pope after a final vote at the next Council session. By its vote on November 20, says the New York Times, the Council committed itself to issuing the declaration on Jews in the wording that had been elaborated, except for possible last-minute minor revisions.

The text absolves Jews as a whole of the age-old charge that they were responsible for the Crucifixion of Jesus, and is expected to counteract anti-Semitism. The reference to Jews is embedded in a Council declaration on relations with non-Christian faiths.

In the November 30 statement Cardinal Bea said that the Council text was inspired exclusively by "truth, justice, and Christian charity, evidently in full agreement with the Gospel." The Cardinal stressed that the Council wanted to prevent "misuse of religion to justify political discrimination and prejudice."

PRESIDENT BOURGUIBA'S COURAGE

The New York Times says:

The courage of President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia in suggesting Arab-Israeli negotiations and mutual concessions can be measured by the denunciations to which he was subjected by his fellow-Arabs. Arab newspapers accused him of "high treason," and declared him to have "become raving mad."

Implicit in this torrent of abuse is the premise that an Arab is a traitor if he is willing to accept anything less than the total destruction of the state of Israel. Ahmad Shukairy, leader of the Arab's Palestine Liberation Organization, gave this tired old refrain in saying: "The Palestine question can have only one solution — namely, restoration of Arab Palestine without partition, internationalization, or resettlement."

Against this background the specifics of the Bourguiba suggestions — which are hardly likely to arouse enthusiasm in Israel itself — are unimportant compared to the historic fact that a major Arab leader has dared talk some sense on this most delicate of issues. He has spoken of the illusory dreams of military victory over Israel, and called attention to the great cost of the arms effort aimed at that objective.

He had the courage to suggest that Arab-Israel enmity is not a law of nature, but rather a temporary situation that could be eased by a thaw that might ultimately develop into genuine cooperation for mutual advantage.

Coming at a time of mounting tension over the Arab plans to divert the waters of the Jordan River, the Bourguiba intervention is particularly significant. Fear of war over this issue has been broadly expressed throughout the Middle East for months now, and the actual outbreak of organized fighting could set off a conflagration of major proportions.

By his words of reason, Tunisia's President is evidently seeking to remind both sides that there are alternatives to conflict and that those alternatives deserve exploration at the bargaining table. The courage of this move is exceeded only by its statesmanship, though it would be a mistake to expect any results in the near future from the seed of wisdom that President Bourguiba has now publicly planted.

BOURGUIBA: "EVERYONE KNOWS THAT A WAR OVER PALESTINE IS IMPOSSIBLE"

Israel and negotiation over the return of the Palestine refugees.

The Government-owned newspaper Al Goumhouria carried a front page article noting that these three countries had not yet commented on Mr. Bourguiba's remarks, which have been bitterly attacked by the governments and press in the rest of the Arab world.

"Do these capitals support Bourguiba's statement?" Al Goumhouria asked. "Does silence imply consent on their part to Bourguiba's proposals?"

When parts of Mr. Bourguiba's declarations reached Cairo, knowledgeable Egyptians were convinced that the Tunisian leader expected at least tacit support from some other Arab states. They recalled that, after Mr. Bourguiba took the lead publicly in opposing a diplomatic break with West Germany, says the New York Times, over its plans to recognize Israel, Morocco, and Libya followed suit.

These developments have led some Arab and Western analysts to conclude that Mr. Bourguiba was not only proposing a new Palestine policy for Arabs, but is also bent on leading the Maghreb — North African Arab states — out of Cairo's orbit and is trying to isolate Algeria as the only Maghreb state siding with President Gamal Abdel Nasser.

There have been persistent reports that King Hassan II of Morocco is increasingly unenthusiastic about the Palestine cause and that King Idris of Libya is concerned over what he apparently sees as a Cairo drift to the East.

Premier Levi Eshkol asserted that the Arab refugees should remain in the Arab states for their own good.

While the Premier did not mention President Bourguiba, this appeared to be his answer to one of the two conditions posed by the Tunisian leader for direct peace talks between Israel and the Arab states.

President Bourguiba had called for the return to Israel of the Arab refugees displaced in the Palestine war of 1947-48 and the constriction of Israel's borders as conditions for the talks. These provisions would be in accordance with a 1947 United Nations resolution on Palestine.

Speaking at the Nebi Shueib religious festival of the Moslem Druse community in northern Israel, Premier Eshkol declared:

"The benefit of the Arab refugees demands the continuation and the support of the process of their resettlement and rehabilitation among their religious, cultural, and lingual kinfolk in their natural economic and cultural setting."

Deputy Premier Abba Eban rejected President Bourguiba's demand that Israel's borders be withdrawn to those agreed upon by the United Nations in 1947.

Premier Eshkol told the Arab leaders "who are threatening war" to stop using the refugee issue as "a weapon" to further their aims, reports the New York Times. He charged that the refugees benefit was not in the Arab leaders' minds. He also observed that Israel had settled hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

Mr. Justice Samuel Freedman, of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, will be one of four to receive honorary degrees of Doctor of Laws at Spring convocations of the University of Toronto. Professor Judah H. Quastel, of Montreal, Professor of Biochemistry at McGill University, has been named a Royal Society Leverhulme Visiting Professor of Biochemistry to India. The appointment, made by the Royal Society of London, England, marks the first time that this professorship has been designated in the biochemistry field. In addition to lectures, the major portion of Prof. Quastel's time abroad will be spent in an effort to lend help and guidance to India's program of research.

Following the completion of his work there, Prof. Quastel will spend at least two months in Israel as Visiting Professor of Biochemistry at the Hebrew University. Role Of Jewish People Is To Await Act Of Catholic Conscience With Dignity

Commenting on reports from Rome that the draft declaration on the Jews may be changed or delayed by the Ecumenical Council, Rabbi Joachim Prinz, president of the American Jewish Congress, declared in New York:

"The Vatican Council schema on the Jews is a matter of concern primarily to Catholics. It was drafted out of recognition that certain aspects of Catholic doctrine, over the centuries have been a hidden but major cause of anti-Semitism.

"The decision of the Catholic fathers to undertake a statement on the Jews should thus be seen not as an effort to exonerate the Jews from the guilt of deicide (the Jewish people have never accepted the charge) but as a means of exonerating the church from the responsibilities it bears for anti-Semitism and the horrors that have resulted from it.

"As the Ecumenical Council continues to discuss changes in those Catholic teachings that have led to anti-Semitism, the Jewish people have no role to play but to await with patience and dignity the act of Catholic conscience which the present draft schema represents."
